Trail Riders of the Canadian Rockies

BULLETIN No. 18

TO THE LAKE OF THE HANGING GLACIERS WITH THE CANADIAN TRAIL RIDERS

By Llewellyn Kitchell, Cleveland Heights

AFTER a two-days' journey through Canada's famous wheat fields that left no doubt about the winter's bread supply, I arrived at Banff one lovely summer morning early in August. The western secretary, Mr. Crosby, walked up to me almost at once, selecting me through some magic of his own, as a possible Trail Rider from among some thirty or forty tourists descending from the train. He informed me that the others had all started early in the morning on the hundred mile auto ride to the base camp, but that I was to go out with him, his wife and one or two others. Giving me just time to change from train clothes to Trail Rider's outfit, we started.

It is astonishing how one's everyday life drops away like a mantle when one starts into the mountains. A new life takes you in. A new world opens its arms to you. Clean, clear air envelops you and you emerge from the rut of your daily life into a wide heaven of pure delight. As you return, the life of every day reaches out to you at the sound of the first auto horn, but you are changed; you are better and you are happier.

It was a delightful ride. The air of the high altitude gets into your blood like wine, a tingling excitement lays hold of you, a delightful feeling of youth and possibility rushes in, and, as you whirl along the mountain road, all seems well with the world. There is nothing so far away as the trials of life and nothing so near as the peace within. The last twenty miles of this road were made in the dark and on returning, a week later, in the daylight, I discovered that we had whirled around the side of a mountain at thirty miles an hour over a narrow, bumpy road with about a foot between us and a neat drop into the flower-dotted valley below.

It seemed all too soon, although it was ten o'clock, when the teepees of the base camp came into view, illuminated by the gleams of a great campfire and accompanied by the roar of the racing mountain river, Horsethief Creek, up to whose very source at the Lake of the Hanging Glaciers we were to climb. Toasting their faces and freezing their backs, as is the way at campfires, was a cosmopolitan gathering of mountain lovers. The Arts were represented by a painter, an etcher and a musician. There was a judge, a doctor, railroad men, army men, and famous mountain climbers. People from all over the States and Canada. Walter Nixon, the official guide of the party, was there as full of stories, both true and false, as an ideal guide ought to be.

Mountain nights are chilly, some call them cold, and the tenderfoot may shiver instead of sleep in his sleeping bag, but the mountain air and the thrill of the whole business takes care of all that and at the first bang on the dishpan you willingly rise to greet the day. The second bang on the dishpan means breakfast. The cook makes his toast immediately after he makes his fires so as to be right on the dot with it at the eight o'clock breakfast. That boiling, roaring, icy stream is the wash basin for all those who do not develop a technique for wheedling some warm water from the cook. He is stingy with it because it all has to be carried in buckets. The food was good and plentiful. Our cook was a Canadian with a fine sense of courtesy, especially on the part of his dishwasher, and he certainly knew how to make strong tea. Like other things from Canada it could be "cut" four times without detection.

After breakfast we rolled and tied the bedrolls, filed them together for the pack ponies and went to the corral to select a "mild-eyed cayuse." The start was slow because each pony had to have a number tied on his tail with a corresponding number on his saddle and on the bedroll. Thus were you irrevocably tied together for the trip no matter how you liked your pony's disposition or his foot-work. There were few complaints, however, as they were fat as butter and knew their job of climbing and sticking to the trail. No chance for fancy horsemanship; the first requisite was endurance. The western saddle is best for trail riding because it is comfortable whether you are sitting on the high front of it, on the high back of it, or, occasionally, resting in the middle. As you zigzag along the steep places it is like my idea of riding a camel . . . hump, hump, hump, as you rise, rise, rise on the trail.

There were about eighty people on this year's ride, exclusive of guides, wranglers and cooks, and the costumes were a sight to behold. Boots and breeches on everybody, wool shirts, sweaters or jackets when it was cold, an occasional Hudson's Bay blanket-coat (the envy of all the coatless), small hats, large hats, boy scout hats, no hats, and gay kerchiefs of every hue. Mrs. Bill Brewster in red wool breeches and Tom Mix boots with the Kananakis Dude Ranche girls in wool chaps of every shade, bright kerchiefs and cowboy hats, looked like a rainbow breezing down the trail.

At first the trail was wide and handsome and we trotted and cantered along, the easterners trying to forget how to post. But long before the eighteen miles were over, which constituted the day's trip to the upper camp, all chance for speed was gone.

We were using the season's camps of the Alpine Club of Canada, a royal company composed of climbers from all over the world. Their teepees and cook tents were all set up when we arrived and mattresses of fresh evergreen boughs had been solicitously spread in the tents. It takes experience to spread boughs so that the hard ends come exactly under the hip bones and shoulderblades. But it can be done, and how sweet those fresh boughs smell!

After supper came the singsong around a great log fire. All the wise ones had a blanket to place at their backs. The songs were clever parodies set to tunes so well known that everyone could read the song sheet and yell to his heart's content. Some songs were funny, none were sad, some few true poetry, filled with the emotion of the mountain lover. Such a combination of things tempts one to stay up all night, but the lure of to-morrow's trail and the soft evergreen boughs drew us, one by one, to bed.

The tents of the upper camp were placed at the bottom of a beautiful mountain bowl with green sides, the upper rim edged with white in a design drawn by the Great Artist himself. Flowing through it, like a great crack in the bowl, boiled and roared the Horsethief Creek. From here the members of the Alpine Club made their climbs in the surrounding mountains. These things we did not see, however, as their work was done and the camps were turned over to us, some of them joining the Trail Ride. Six of our number climbed The Dome, however, our beautiful neighbor, ten thousand feet high. By doing so they became eligible for membership in the Alpine Club, as a climb of this height is an entrance requirement.

To reach our objective we had to climb one of the sides of the cracked bowl. We had to follow the Horsethief up his mountain. Mounting our cayuses, shortly after breakfast of the third day, the first step was to ford this roaring, boiling, icy stream which flows so swiftly that the pony must sidle upstream in order to go straight across. I seemed to afford some amusement as I scaled my mild-eyed Mac and a movie should have been made of the ascent, but the cameraman found other scenery more to his taste.

In front of us was a solid wall of deep green trees with a slim little tongue of a trail projecting, which promised nothing but fulfilled to the uttermost. Entering, one was at once engulfed by shade as if one were at the bottom of a deep green sea. The trail twisted and turned among the tall pine trees and the ponies stepped soundlessly on deep green moss. This fairyland was soon left behind and we began the steepest ascent of the entire trip. We zigzagged up the side of the mountain on a narrow rough trail which Mr. Nixon called "ladylike" because some stones had been kicked into the canyon and some brush removed. The turns were so sharp that the ponies' heads bumped into their tails as they bent themselves around them. About half-way up the trail crossed an open space where a landslide had occurred. Below, boiling and roaring and beautiful, was the Horsethief. This ledge of a trail, possibly a foot wide, was level for a space. My mild-eyed cayuse decided to trot. Nothing was said between us. Pebbles leaped, dust flew. Nothing happened at all. My heart went right on beating along.

Nearing the top of the trail we crossed three lovely mountain meadows spread with flowers. They looked like the postcards that you don't believe are true, so beautiful were the colors. The upper reaches of the trail, above timber line, went over broken rock so uneven that the ponies slipped and slid, stopping at times to rest and breathe, while below, spread in a sheet of rushing water over a smooth rock, or plunging in great leaps, boiled and roared the Horsethief.

Our stopping place was an extensive meadow eight thousand feet above the sea, where the Horsethief steals away from the Lake of the Hanging Glaciers. On each side of us were towering walls of rock, one side going up and up to become The Dome, the delight of the student climber because it is only ten thousand feet high. In front of us was the lake formed by the waters of the melting glacier at the foot of the mountain on that side. In it were floating great pieces of ice that had broken off, and the edge toward us was dammed by other ice not yet melted into the Horsethief. Across the lake, in the crotch of a great snow-capped peak, lay the lazy glacier with a rugged, cold face a hundred feet high. It was a beautiful spot of varied aspects, at once peaceful and awe-inspiring, tranquil and rugged, but in every way delightful, a priceless possession to have in one's mind. They told us that few had visited the spot before, but certainly many will follow us there.

Suddenly a beautiful yodel was heard. Looking up we saw Dr. Best and Mrs. Shippam high above us cozily perched on the rocks at the top of a long, descending snow patch which was lying on the steep side of the mountain. They rose, stepped on the snow and, one behind the other, descended in a beautiful glissade. It looked so simple and so easy as they stood, balancing themselves with their long-handled ice axes, and slid gracefully down the snow. But it was the ease and grace of long practice.

After lunch the program was left to the inclination of the individual. Some took pictures. Others rested on the grass, gazing and filling their souls with the beauty of the place and the day. One, Carl Rungius, famous wild-animal painter and the new president of the Trail Riders, added to his collection of butterflies, and several parties, assisted by guides, threaded their difficult way around the lake on the broken stones that surround it, and went out onto the glacier. It was rough and full of crevasses, so they got an idea of the mountain climber's art.

All that goes up must come down, so reluctantly we made the start campward down that "ladylike" trail. It was an experience that sent some to their feet. My mild-eyed Mac made it mincingly as if he had ingrowing toenails and I stood in the stirrups with my head close to his tail. It was not dangerous, only steep. 'Mid such scenes one's mind is not occupied with the difficulties of the trail, but with beauty. The deep green of the trees, the pearly white of the snows, the curves of the hills, the rush and gleam of the waterfalls, the song in one's heart . . . that is happiness.

Bigger and better campfires, bigger and better singing, bigger eating and better sleeping were the tale of the close of that day.

Early the next morning the six intrepid climbers started on their eight hour "dance" up and down The Dome while the Trail Riders visited the ice caves under Dragon Glacier on another mountain.

In the afternoon the start on the return trail was made. We spent the night at the middle camp where we had lunched on the way up. On the morning of the fifth day a lingering start was made for the base camp, the Pow Wow, and farewells. No one wanted to go. We had just gotten into our stride as campers, ambition to climb had begun to swell, and we had learned how to cuddle our hip bones and shoulder blades into comfort in the evergreen boughs.

When the stragglers arrived at the base camp they found that the committees had gone into executive session to elect the new president, fill vacancies on the council and make plans for the following year's ride. While this serious business was going on, the guides gave an exhibition of one-man packing, using the diamond hitch. Just as I arrived on the scene a perspiring candidate remarked,

"Might as well call this off. I've got this diamond twisted."

He was immediately given a lesson by Walter Nixon, his chief.

The next candidate, however, gave a very pretty show of how to pack a portable organ, a bedroll and a large camera on the back of a patient cayuse. Nevertheless, the prize went to Mr. Nixon, who did it in nothing with the speed and ease of long practice.

Not far from the corral was pitched a large round tent where the gentlemen of the party had slept in a circle with their feet toward the centre. It was fantastically decorated with pictures of grizzlies, caribou, deer, mountain goats and a huge eagle. It was here that the Pow Wow was held.

By the light of two small candles the business and the fun of the evening were concluded. The portable organ, which had turned up faithfully for every singsong, was in the middle of the tent and we all draped ourselves around on the ground.

The first number was the national anthem, "O Canada." Announcements were then made on reports of committees, more songs were sung, a young lady in a natty, improvised kilt danced the Highland Fling on an old door dragged in from somewhere. A parade of the lady Trail Riders followed, the most appropriate costume to receive a prize. During this parade the three worthy judges stood with their heads together discussing what constituted a suitable costume for a lady on a trail ride. They decided on high, laced boots suitable for both riding and walking, with a bit of colored stock showing above, if possible. Breeches, a sheathed knife at the belt, wool shirt, a blanket coat, if possible, a small hat with a brim and a bright-colored kerchief. If they had looked at me I probably should have won the prize, but they looked somewhere else. The decision against chaps was a hard blow to the Kananaskis group.

Next in order came the contest of the guides for the best story. It was won by Jack Sladen. He told us that he was hunting one time, three thousand feet above timber line, when suddenly a big grizzly charged him from the surrounding underbrush. Having no time to shoot, he scrambled with all speed up a tall pine tree that grew high in lonely pride. The bear sat on his haunches, looking up, growling, and scratching the tree with his claws in plain invitation for the hunter to descend into his loving arms. But he stubbornly clung to the limb.

After some time of this, another bear came down the mountain toward them. The two bears greeted each other, sniffed around the tree for one, so far as known, has ever been in it, but some daredevil was able to climb above it and let himself down by a rope so that he could see in. He found it to be a cave of great dimensions. That is the truth of the matter.

A charming Canadian gentleman told me gravely that once each year the Masons of Banff climb up to the hole and have a meeting.

"Of course," he said, "it is a very difficult climb."

The next morning we tied the bedrolls for the last time and reluctantly took our places in awhile, and then the second bear started up the mountain and disappeared. Presently, to the man's amazement, the bear reappeared with a beaver in each hand. The beaver, apparently under orders, immediately gnawed the tree down, but the tree, in falling, threw Jack into a stream and he swam down the mountain to safety.

This tale won the prize because its truth was so apparent. But the best lie, in my opinion, was this one. Near Banff, half-way up a great stone mountain, is a mysterious hole resembling a great doorway to a mammoth cathedral. No the automobiles for the long ride back to Banff, but as we rolled along, the scenes, the air and the good-fellowship worked its own magic and the fun we had compensated for all regret that it was over for this year. As Miss Skookum Chuck replied, when asked if she had a good time:

"I'll tell the whole world I did."

If you have not yet sent in your annual dues, send them now to the Secretary-Treasurer, Room 324 Windsor Station, Montreal.

* THE MASSACRE OF THE BREWSTERS *

Oh Brew-sters swore a feud A - gainst the clan of Wal-ters, Marched in-to their camp with lar - i - ats and hal-ters; For they did re - solve To ex-tir-pate the vi - pers With four and twenty guides And five and thir-ty pip-ers Oh -
 Mm ----- mm ----- Mm ----- mm -----
 Mm ----- And that's the Brew-ster cho - rus.

2. Bill and M<sup>r</sup>s Bill,
 Jim and M<sup>r</sup>s Jimmie.
 Pat and M<sup>r</sup>s Pat
 Did a Highland Shimmy;
 One of them in chaps,
 Two of them in breeches
 Three of them in kilts
 All were making speeches.
 Oh, etc.

3. This you may think strange,
 Thinking they are Paddies;
 They began to change
 Through eating Finnan Haddies.
 Irish they were born
 But forgot their fattering,
 Drinking Scotch at morn
 At last year's Highland Gathering.
 Oh, etc.

6. Then round their necks
 Deftly put a rope on;
 Where the eagle pecks
 Hung them in the open.
 Thus the Brewsters died.
 For their souls do pray, Sirs;
 Where they now reside
 Is on the Hanging Glaciers.
 Oh, etc.

4. With them came a pack
 Made of Shetland ponies,
 Ready for attack
 With a bunch of Stonies.
 First on Walter Feuz,
 Then on Walter Nixon,
 Then on Walter D.
 Wilcox they laid their sticks on.
 Oh, etc.

5. But in Walter Feuz
 They did catch a Tarter,
 He was not the Swiss
 To meekly die a martyr.
 Out he took his ropes
 With yodels and with scowls
 And scattered all their hopes
 His pickaxe in their bowels.
 Oh, etc.
